Carla

How do I spend my free time? I like to go dancing. My friends and I go dancing almost every weekend. Every Friday and Saturday night, we go dancing at clubs in our area. We get together with other friends, and we make new friends. We like all kinds of music, but we usually go to the clubs that play Latin music. A couple of times a month, I take a dance class. Dancing is a really good way to keep in shape. I don't need to work out at a gym. Dancing keeps me fit.

Roberta

I spend my free time taking care of my tropical fish. I have a large aquarium in my living room, and I take good care of my fish. I have many books on this topic. I also have a few friends who like keeping fish, too. We get together once a month at a coffee shop nearby and talk about what's new with our fish and what new fish we've bought. I also spend a lot of time on social media following other people who keep fish, and people follow my posts, too. Watching my fish is very relaxing after a hard day at work.

Yelena

After I retired, I was bored, and I needed something to do. One day, I saw two men playing chess in the lounge in my building. It brought back memories for me. My father taught me how to play chess, and I even joined the chess team in high school. When I was in college, I didn't have time for chess, and then I began to work, and I stopped playing chess. Now, I'm playing again. Chess is a game for people who like to think. I'm getting older, and I want to keep my mind sharp. I play every evening. Tomorrow, I'm going to start teaching my grandson how to play.

The Yang family is now in Vancouver, Canada, staying with Victor, William's younger brother. Victor and his family moved to Vancouver three years ago. Victor decided to move to Vancouver after he visited the city on a business trip. He liked the clean streets, the natural setting, and the economic opportunities. At first, his wife, Lin, didn't want to move there, but after a couple of months, she met a few other immigrants from Hong Kong. They introduced her to more people in the neighborhood. Now, Lin likes Vancouver very much, and she has a job. She works three mornings a week at her daughter's elementary school. There are many other children there who speak Cantonese or Mandarin, so the school needs experienced teachers like Lin who can speak both languages.

Right now, Victor and Lin are taking William and his family around Vancouver. Yesterday, they walked across the Capilano Suspension Bridge and took a lot of photos. This morning, they visited Granville Island. They walked around the Public Market and enjoyed looking at the local and imported fruits, vegetables, and flowers. Then, they decided to relax and have some breakfast and coffee at the Public Market food court.

It's 12 o'clock now, and they're on their way to Gastown, the oldest part of Vancouver. They're going to take a trolley tour to learn more about this historic neighborhood. Later, they're going to stop at Queen Elizabeth Park and visit the Rose Garden. They're also going to visit the Vancouver Aquarium. After that, they're going to have dinner in Chinatown with some friends. William and his family are having a wonderful time. They can't wait until Victor and his family come to San Francisco next year.

Community Gardening

In January, seed catalogs begin to arrive at homes across the United States. Hardware stores start selling seeds and plants. Gardening is a very popular hobby in this country. For some people, it is not just a relaxing activity, but also an economic bonus.

In many cities throughout the United States, there are community garden programs. According to the American Community Gardening Association, a community garden is "any piece of land gardened by a group of people." Residents who do not have yards where they can start gardens can grow vegetables and flowers in parks, on vacant city lots, or in other empty spaces in their neighborhoods. However, residents might need permission to start a garden on city property. Among the benefits of community gardening are the beautification of neighborhoods, the social interaction between neighbors in the gardens, and the ability of families to save money on produce.

The gardens are usually organized by community members, and they help other residents select tools, seeds, plants, and other materials. Sometimes there is a children's program, which uses the gardens to teach elementary school students about science and math. Youth can also participate by helping with the gardening or giving tours to people who visit the gardens. Gardening can teach residents about healthy food, too. As you can see, a community garden does more than just grow fruits, flowers, and vegetables.
